

BRINGING UNITED STATES v. HARDEN TO ITS CONCLUSION: THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT’S RELUCTANCE TO ACT ON THE FLAWED DECISION’S CONSEQUENCES

INTRODUCTION

Though United States magistrate judges have a large impact on the federal judiciary, and have had in some capacity for well over 200 years, questions persist on how far their authority extends. These questions arise from a grant of authority in the Federal Magistrates Act that provides that “[a] magistrate judge may be assigned such additional duties as are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.”¹ One of the additional duties that district courts have assigned to magistrate judges is presiding over guilty plea proceedings.²

A defendant in the Southern District of Illinois consented to having a magistrate judge conduct and accept his felony guilty plea.³ The magistrate judge accepted the defendant’s plea, but later the defendant appealed the magistrate judge’s decision to accept the plea. The defendant argued that the magistrate judge’s decision to accept the plea was an abuse of discretion because the defendant did not consent.

⁵ The decision created a split among the circuits on whether magistrate judges may accept defendants’ guilty pleas after performing Rule 11(b) colloquies.⁶

Since the court’s decision in Harden, many federal prisoners who had a magistrate judge accept their felony pleas have attempted to collaterally attack their sentences.⁷ So far, no prisoner has been successful in obtaining collateral

1. 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(3) (2012).

2. Admin. Office of the U.S. Courts, Table S-17. Matters Disposed of by U.S. Magistrate Judges During the 12-Month Periods Ending September 30, 2006 Through 2015, 2015 Annual Report of the Director: Judicial Business of the United States (2015).

3. United States v. Harden, 758 F.3d 886, 887 (7th Cir. 2014).

4. Id.

5.

the FMA created an office to which Congress assigned specific duties.

felony guilty pleas was too important to be considered a mere additional duty, and, therefore, the FMA did not authorize magistrate judges to accept them.⁶⁴

Harden's logic was simple. It noted that the FMA does not permit magistrate judges to conduct felony trials.⁶⁵ According to Harden, once a judge accepts a defendant's guilty plea, "the prosecution is at the same stage as if a jury had just returned a verdict of guilty after a trial" because each "results in a final and consequential shift in the defendant's status."⁶⁶ The acceptance of a felony guilty plea, therefore, is "quite similar in importance to the conducting of a felony trial."⁶⁷ Because a magistrate judge cannot conduct a felony trial, and felony guilty pleas are of similar importance, it concluded that magistrate judges may not accept felony guilty pleas.⁶⁸ Harden's logic is valid but not sound.

D. Harden's Flawed Premise

As Harden noted, the FMA does not specifically list the power to accept felony guilty pleas among the tasks magistrate judges may perform. But magistrate judges may perform additional duties as are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.⁶⁹ The Supreme Court has noted that an additional duty "reasonably should bear some relation to the specified duties" or be "comparable in responsibility and importance" to a specified duty its analysis under Peretz. In this way, Harden went against established Supreme Court precedent on what a court should and should not construe as an additional duty of the FMA.

E. Harden's Misapplication of Precedent

Prior to Peretz, in Gomez, the Supreme Court found that any additional duty a magistrate judge may perform must bear some resemblance to the duties the FMA specifically lists.⁸³ In Gomez, because it could not find a resemblance of a magistrate judge's supervision of voir dire in a felony case to any listed duties in the FMA, it found the practice unlawful.⁸⁴ Just two years later, in Peretz, the Court upheld the practice of a magistrate judge's supervision of voir dire because the defendant affirmatively consented to the magistrate judge's involvement.⁸⁵ The Court explained its apparent about-face noting that the defendant's consent to the magistrate judge's involvement in Peretz "significantly" changed the constitutional analysis.⁸⁶ The Court asserted that when the defendant consents, it is of "far less importance" that Congress may not have focused on the particular task as a possible additional duty for magistrate judges.⁸⁷ The Court went so far as to say that even in cases where the additional duty was of "far greater importance" than other tasks the FMA authorizes, the defendant's consent makes "the crucial difference."⁸⁸ The additional duties clause gives "significant leeway" to the courts.⁸⁹ pleas where the district judge violated Rule 11. It has upheld these pleas even though it believes a change of plea to be “more than an admission of past conduct: it is the defendant’s consent that judgment of conviction may be entered without a trial—a waiver of his right to trial before a jury or judge.”¹¹⁸

Further, while Harden found a magistrate judge lawfully cannot enter a guilty plea, it found magistrate judges still could have an integral part in felony guilty plea proceedings.¹¹⁹ Harden noted that widespread agreement exists that a magistrate judge may conduct a Rule 11 colloquy for the purpose of making a report and recommendation.¹²⁰ Harden agreed that this is a “permissible practice.”¹²¹ But that conclusion undermines the previous reverence the opinion had for Rule 11 plea colloquies. The Seventh Circuit elsewhere has noted that at a plea hearing, it is the “district judge who observes a defendant’s appearance, demeanor, and tone of voice.”¹²² But this does not occur when a magistrate judge conducts the plea and issues a report and recommendation because the district judge is not present. In a report and recommendation, the district judge cannot observe the defendant’s appearance, demeanor, or tone of voice during the colloquy. The district judge instead must rely entirely on the judgment of the magistrate judge’s observation and the hearing’s transcript.¹²³ Whether a magistrate judge enters a judgment of guilt or merely issues a report and recommendation, the district judge does not observe the defendant. Yet the former is unlawful, the latter permissible.

Allowing one and disavowing the other is even more confounding because a district judge’s review of a report and recommendation in a felony guilty plea proposed findings or recommendations *to which objection is made.*¹²⁵ If a defendant does not object within fourteen days of the magistrate judge's report and recommendation, the district court will accept it and enter a judgment of guilt.¹²⁶ This lack of reevaluation demonstrates why report and recommendations in cases of felony guilty pleas are unusual and counterintuitive.

The FMA provides that a "magistrate judge shall file his proposed findings and recommendations" true.”¹³¹ So, if the magistrate judge asked every question and the defendant answered accordingly, the district judge would have no reason not to adopt the report and recommendation and would enter a judgment of guilt. The only issue, then, would be whether the magistrate judge followed Rule 11’s procedure, and Harden itself noted that “[t]he questions are not hard to ask.”¹³² And, again, if the magistrate judge failed to ask the required questions, the defendant could have withdrawn the plea under Rule 11.¹³³

G. Harden’s Aftermath

After Harden, defendants from the Seventh Circuit and circuits across the country have attempted to collaterally attack their sentences arguing that the magistrate judge lacked authority to adjudicate them guilty.¹³⁴ Even in circuits where the Court of Appeals has held the practice both legal and constitutional, collateral attacks have emerged.¹³⁵ In 2008, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit held in United States v. Benton that the FMA allows magistrate judges to accept felony guilty pleas with consent.¹³⁶ Even so, prisoners from the Fourth Circuit have attempted to collaterally attack their sentences relying on Harden.

appealability.¹⁴⁹ Then, on October 14, 2014, McCoy filed a motion with the Seventh Circuit to vacate his § 2255 appeal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction based on Harden.¹⁵⁰ The Seventh Circuit construed the motion as an application for certificate of appealability, issued an order granting McCoy's certificate of appealability, and on its own motion recruited counsel to brief two issues: (1) did McCoy default any claim regarding the acceptance

MLC
McCatean

/Spanehewcadu49

<</MCID

25

>>B

District for the Northern Mariana Islands are not Article III district judges but Article IV territorial court judges.¹⁷¹ Territorial court judges, like magistrate judges, are not appointed through the Article III process and do not enjoy any of Article III's protections.¹⁷² The Ninth Circuit's panel therefore consisted of two Article III judges and one non-Article III judge.¹⁷³ In the Ninth Circuit's decision, all three judges agreed on the merits of the case and affirmed without dissent.¹⁷⁴ In a regular panel hearing, only two judges need to agree to decide the case. Ignoring the non-Article III judge who sat on the panel, two Article III judges still heard the case and ruled on its merits. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court reversed.¹⁷⁵

In urging the Court to uphold the Ninth Circuit's decision, the government pointed out that neither party objected to the panel's makeup or petitioned for rehearing.¹⁷⁶ The government asserted that this "failure to challenge the panel's composition at the earliest practicable moment completely foreclose[d] relief in [the] Court."¹⁷⁷ But because the error in the case involved a violation of a statutory provision that "embodi[ed] a strong policy concerning the proper administration of judicial business," the Court invalidated the judgment of the Court of Appeals without even assessing prejudice or the parties' failure to object.¹⁷⁸

[T]o ignore the violation of the statute in these cases would incorrectly suggest that some action (or inaction) on petitioners' part could create authority Congress has quite carefully wtald artd efth d [(p)-7.3(a8)2.11.790..2(t)e [(as)-41.5(h)-a1.1(d)-7ex.8(t)p.3(o)-7.3

prohibiting them from now withdrawing the pleas “would incorrectly suggest that some action (or inaction) on [their] part could create authority Congress has quite carefully withheld.”¹⁸⁰

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit came to a similar conclusion in United States v. Jackson.¹⁸¹ There, the defendant pleaded guilty in the Western District of Virginia to one count of drug conspiracy.¹⁸² At the same time, a grand jury in the Western District of Pennsylvania indicted him with one count of being a felon in possession of a weapon.¹⁸³ The District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania transferred its indictment to the Western District of Virginia, as Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 20 allows.¹⁸⁴ Through oversight, the District Court for the Western District of Virginia ultimately sentenced the defendant to 262 months’ imprisonment on the drug conspiracy count and to a concurrent term of 180 months’ imprisonment on the felon-in-possession, Pennsylvania count.¹⁸⁵ The defendant, though, never pleaded guilty to the felon-in-possession count transferred from the Western District of Pennsylvania.¹⁸⁶ Though he failed to object to the entry of a judgment of conviction on the felon-in-possession count, the Fourth Circuit still vacated the judgment noting that, “the entry of a judgment reflecting that [the defendant] was convicted of a crime for which he neither pleaded guilty nor received a jury trial was error that was plain, and that affected his substantial rights.”¹⁸⁷

No one adjudicated McCoy and similarly-situated defendants within the Seventh Circuit guilty. Because Harden found magistrate judges lack the statutory authority to accept and adjudicate felony guilt, the entrance of these defendant’s guilt was void from its inception. These individuals should be allowed to withdraw their pleas, but that wording fails to encapsulate the more nuanced issue. No actual plea exists to withdraw. If the FMA never authorized magistrate judges to adjudicate defendants guilty, then the plea never truly existed in the first place. Nevertheless, the court still entered a judgment of

180. See id. at 80.

181. 200 F. App’x 191, 192 (4th Cir. 2006).

182. Id.

183. Id.

184. Id.

185. Id.

186. Jackson

guilt and sentenced the defendants. The question after McCoy is how do defendants obtain that remedy?

C. Writ of Habeas Corpus and § 2255

The members of the Constitutional Convention included the writ of habeas cd2d [T[(T)-2.6(0.023 .5()(0.023 .5()(0.023 .5()(0t)5.3(r)3.5(i)5.3(t)5c1 1 Tfoubt)5.3()3.5(y0 T

Harden. The Seventh Circuit issued its opinion in Harden on July 14, 2014.¹⁹⁷ The one-year limitation passed, and none of § 2255's time extensions readily appear to extend it. The Seventh Circuit noted that it "has not yet decided whether Harden applies retroactively in collateral proceedings."¹⁹⁸ District courts have noted their belief that Harden does not apply retroactively.¹⁹⁹ This discussion of retroactivity misses the point. Harden did not announce a new rule. The decision was "premised solely on a statutory interpretation of the Federal Magistrates Act."²⁰⁰ As Harden put it, "the [Federal Magistrates Act] simply does not authorize a magistrate judge to accept a felony guilty plea."²⁰¹ Harden did not announce a new constitutional idea or principle to even make retroactive; it stated what the law is. It, by its very nature, is retroactive, not because it came up with a new idea or changed previously existing law, but because it clarified that a statute does not impart the authority to enter judgments of felony guilt. If the statute does not impart authority today, it could not have yesterday—regardless of whether courts were operating under the assumption that it did.

Section 2255'n9TD [(c)0.8EMC /P <5.3602use(ha)0.8y guid orhirs[f9e32cudgmc-2ausee ng w, and according to the Seventh Circuit, neither do magistrate judges.²⁰⁵

2017]

BRINGING UNITED STATES v. HARDEN TO ITS CONCLUSION

349

CONCLUSION

Harden

